Rebecca Lev, a Chicago psychotherapist, is balancing a heavy workload, two demanding kids, and an unhappy second marriage--so when she senses that her father, Charlie, is in trouble, it's just one more worry.

Charlie has moved into a grand home in the Bay Area with his new wife, Vicky, who Rebecca meets and immediately distrusts. There are signs that the woman is physically abusing him. Rebecca tries to intervene, but Charlie doesn't want her help. He dies of a cerebral hemorrhage, and Rebecca strongly suspects that Vicky is implicated although there is no proof. Feeling guilty that she didn't better protect her father, she returns to the Bay Area to investigate his death, vowing to find out what really happened.

Frustrated at every turn in her investigation, Rebecca flees to Clear Lake, the scene of some of her happiest childhood memories. She collapses there, unable to go further, and finally confronts the emotional chaos that has been building within her. She reaches a place of peace and resolution within herself--and it gives her the strength to make some fundamental changes in her life and find out the shocking truth of her father's death.
